

The search for the next bonanza-grade ore shoot continues

GIG HARBOR, Wash., June 2, 2017 /PRNewswire/ -- LKA Gold Incorporated (OTCQB: LKAI) reports that Kinross drilling contractors have mobilized and resumed drilling at LKA's Golden Wonder mine. The drilling program, which was initiated in late 2016 but suspended due to severe weather conditions, is designed to test several areas (targets) identified by Kinross geologists during a detailed geochemistry evaluation of the surface area adjacent to, and well beyond, the original Golden Wonder discovery. See maps of Kinross drill targets at: <http://lkagold.com/golden-wonder-mine>

Each of the drill targets possess surface geochemistry remarkably similar to the original high-grade ore shoot that, during LKA's ownership, yielded over 141,000 ounces from an area measuring less than 10,000 square feet. Ore grades from commercial production (2000-2006) were 16.01 oz gold per ton. "Life of Mine" grades, (including exploratory mining) are 11.63 oz. (362 grams) gold per ton. Detailed Golden Wonder production records can be found on LKA's website at: <http://lkagold.com/golden-wonder-mine>

In a brief summary of the Golden Wonder mine's potential prepared for LKA management, geologist Rauno Perttu comments "Telluride systems, such as the Golden Wonder, can be up to multimillion ounce in ultimate size. Additionally, the Golden Wonder Mine is in the Colorado Mineral Belt. The Colorado Mineral Belt hosts numerous large ore bodies. One of the largest, the Cripple Creek District, is a telluride deposit that has produced approximately 23 million ounces, and has multi-million ounce reserves left." To understand the context of Mr. Perttu's comments, and similar comments by other experts concerning the Golden Wonder's potential, interested parties are encouraged to see the Presentations & Reports section of the LKA website at: <http://lkagold.com/presentation-reports>
